Cultured human keratinocytes. The development of a culture system capable of propagating and expanding keratinocytes from foreskin was undertaken in this report. The cells were cultured in a serum-free keratinocyte growth medium supplemented with all the usual growth factors required for keratinocyte culture, both alone and in combination with primary murine epidermal basal cells and epidermal growth factor (EGF). The cultured cells had similar characteristics to those of normal human skin. The growth of the cells in vitro was dependent upon the addition of EGF, whereas treatment with EGF in combination with murine basal cells, could not prevent the cells from entering senescence. The cells could be propagated indefinitely in cell culture using this medium. The growth rates of the epidermal cells in the presence of both EGF and mouse basal cells were approximately twice that of cells grown with EGF alone. In addition, these cells were easily cloned and subcultivated in cell culture. Each cell line from successive subcultures retained these properties in culture, and also retained their ability to differentiate in vitro. This system was most useful in screening a number of potentially useful growth factors, which included the following: fibroblast growth factor, platelet-derived growth factor, platelet-derived plasma, insulin, hepatocyte growth factor, transforming growth factor beta 1, and epidermal growth factor.
