If you've subscribed to Hulu in the past, you might be a little surprised to learn that their headquarters are moving from Virginia to Los Angeles this spring. This will bring us closer to the heart of Hollywood and to where the streaming service landed their coveted TV deals with CBS, ABC and Fox. Hulu's Los Angeles headquarters are still under construction and will be ready for employees in late April. The move has also had an impact on fans. The company's new home isn't as big as the one in Virginia, and that means getting to Hulu's headquarters will be a little harder. It's also more difficult to visit Hulu's offices if you're not a subscriber. You'll have to make special arrangements and you'll need a code. It's a lot like a password, but for an entire company. The good news is that if you're a Hulu subscriber, your code is more valuable. It's worth $1,000. That gives you access to Hulu's HQ for a year. It also means you don't have to worry about the space you're watching on Hulu becoming the same one where people make the decisions about what content to add or remove from their service. If you're worried that you're getting left behind, you're not. This is an incentive for you to continue to pay for the service that offers such great content. By the way, Hulu is offering the code for free in the U.S. and Canada for a limited time. As the more experienced pilots among you know, the FAA has imposed new restrictions on the use of autopilot on certain aircraft types, with a specific focus on small, single engine piston, turboprop and helicopter fleets. And of course we all know that small, single engine piston, turboprop and helicopter fleets include Cessna, Piper and Beechcraft, among others, with their popular Bonanza line. And there are many more including the more recent Cirrus SR22G, and in fact any aircraft that meets the 3.5 G engine size limit. This has changed the requirements for use of certain autopilot functions in those aircraft. The most significant change is in what is known as the transition of engine power, or TEP, which is the capability of the autopilot to diseng 4bc0debe42
