For pc Full Version.Q: Rails - Reloading the model after validation fails I have the following situation. I have a model, a User, and a Post model. When a user creates a post, they are redirected to the index page of the posts, created a before_create callback (using the after_create callback method) that checks whether the user is allowed to do what they are trying to do, and I redirect them to a page where they sign up. Then, I have a form on the index page that allows them to fill in their details to create a post. The form is served by the 'create' action on the posts controller.
The problem is that in the form, I have an accepts_nested_attributes_for on the user field in order to have a form that includes it. However, in my after_create callback on the user, I make sure that the user is allowed to post the form, and if they aren't, I redirect them back to the index of the posts. If they are, I also check to see whether they are a valid user, and if so, I redirect them to the create action to post their message. This is all working properly, but when the user posts the form, I'm noticing that in the Before filters for the post model (created by user), the after_create callback that checks that the user is valid (just before_create callback) works normally - even though the user isn't valid. Here's my code in the callback that I use to redirect to the users profile: user.after_create :after_profile_authentication In the before_create callback for the post, I have this: if @post.user_id == user_id redirect_to_user_path end Is there any way I can ensure that the model instance is reloaded after the validation, without having to have the user model change the status of the user? EDIT - The functions below are how I verified that the model is
